

The Subject Fund in Education

Queens' aims to complete the endowment of a new subject fund to support the academic-related activities of the College's Education students.

The Fund will be open to all undergraduate and postgraduate Education students at the College.

Education is one of the most powerful means for change and growth in the modern world. As well as being a major social science, Education at Queens' allows students to take an interdisciplinary approach across psychology, politics, and social and cultural contexts.

Queens' normally has around 40 Education students from undergraduates, teacher trainees right through to PhD research. The breadth of our Education courses means their work spans a wide range of development from birth to adulthood and can be tailored to the specific interests of each students. Whatever their focus may be, studying Education at Queens' allows them to work at the cutting edge of important contemporary themes and on-going debates.

The new Fund will enrich Education at Queens', and provide assistance with:

- Books and other study materials/equipment
- Attendance at conferences, lectures, and QuEdSoc (and other) events
- Participation in and travel to conferences and other enriching experiences
- Contribution to research expenses

We are seeking to endow the Fund in perpetuity with £200,000. This will provide £6,000 per year, to be overseen by the Director of Studies in Education and the Senior Tutor.

A message from Professor Tyler Denmead, Director of Studies in Education at Queens':

“Since becoming the Fellow in Education at Queens in 2018, I have been impressed with Queens' Education students' commitments to academic excellence and social impact. One recent undergraduate was awarded a Distinction* in her Part II exams while establishing an NGO aimed at raising awareness about neurodiversity in her home country. Establishing a Subject Fund will distinguish our college for its support of Education and help us attract the best applicants at both the undergraduate and postgraduate level. It will support them not only in their studies but also the social impact they are already making as educationists.”
