

The Subject Fund in Psychological and Behavioural Sciences

The Psychological and Behavioural Sciences Tripos (Faculty of Biology) enables undergraduates to study for a Cambridge degree in Psychology over three years. This degree confers full accreditation by the British Psychological Society and enables undergraduates to study psychology alongside modules in a wide range of other subjects. These can range from social anthropology, sociology and criminology to disciplines such as cognitive neuroscience, metaphysics and history of science.

The Subject Fund

This will support undergraduate and postgraduate Psychological and Behavioural Sciences students with the costs of their academic-related activities.

A subject fund in PBS will help to remove financial barriers, ensuring our students can take full advantage of the opportunities open to them.

Grants from the Fund will provide individuals with assistance for:

- Books and other study materials/equipment
- Attendance at conferences, lectures, and events
- Participation in and travel to conferences
- Contribution to research expenses
- Dissertation-binding costs

“Although we have a small intake of just three students a year, PBS has an excellent academic record at Queens’ with one of our students topping the Tripos exams and two more students in the top six last summer. We want to build on this success and promote Queens’ as a leading Cambridge College supporting Psychology students in all aspects of their academic endeavour. We therefore plan to establish a College Psychology Society to promote discussion among and cohesion between our students. Supplementing this with a Subject Fund is a key element of our strategy and will enable us to continue to attract and support the most talented students.”

Dr Jane Garrison

We aim to endow the Fund in perpetuity with £100,000. This will provide about £3,000 per annum. Grants from the Fund will be overseen by the Director of Studies in PBS, currently Dr Jane Garrison, who is a cognitive neuroscientist working in the Department of Psychology.
